Ford Motor Co. and Domino's Pizza Inc. in September will begin testing Michigan consumers' reactions to having their pizzas delivered by self-driving vehicles, the companies said on Tuesday.

It will not be the first experiment with [21] pizza delivery technology. Australia-based Domino's Pizza Enterprises, the Ann Arbor-based company's largest independent *franchisee, has tested delivery to customers in New Zealand via drone and self-driving robot.

In a blog post last week, Sherif Marakby, head of Ford's self-driving and electric vehicles, signaled the automaker's broader ambitions. He said Ford planned to cooperate "with multiple partners" in *deploying self-driving vehicles "designed to improve the [22] of people and goods."

Previously, Ford *executives had said the company expected to [23] a self-driving shuttle for commercial ride-sharing *fleets in 2021.

Domino's and Ford will deliver pizzas to randomly selected customers in the Ann Arbor area in a Ford Fusion Hybrid [24] with self-driving technology. The delivery vehicles [25] will be piloted by human drivers.

Customers will be able to track the delivery process via GPS and will receive text messages on how to *retrieve their pizzas [26] the delivery vehicle has arrived.

A number of start-up delivery services, many of them funded by venture capital, have been experimenting with [27] delivery of different packages, including groceries, prepared food and beverages. So have larger companies, from Uber Technologies to Amazon.

Opinion is still divided, however, on [28] automation can help solve some difficult delivery problems, such as how to deliver pizzas economically to the fifth floor of a college dormitory.

The Ford-Domino's test vehicle will not [29] to resolve that *conundrum. It will stop outside the customer's house, so it will not [30] true door to door delivery service.

"We're still focused on the last 50 feet," said Domino's spokeswoman Jenny Fouracre. "That's a big challenge — getting (the pizza) from the curb to the door."
